Small fruits and berries should have a place in every home garden because they adapt themselves to the usual methods of garden culture and they come into production so soon after planting.

The dewberry is one of the easiest to grow and one of the most universally adapted. It will succeed on any type of soil and, although it responds to fertilization does not require a great deal of attention along that line. Plants may be set from now until the growing season begins in spring. The usual planting distances are 5 feet apart in the row with rows 5 to 8 feet apart. For garden culture dewberries are generally trained to stakes which are 5 to 6 feet high. Twenty five plants should supply the average family with all the berries they will need. Plants set this winter will produce a full crop in June of 1953.

NEW BEAN VARIETY
Release of a superior new snap-bean variety named Wade has been announced by the U. S. Department of Agriculture. It has been widely tested by USDA in cooperation with agricultural experiment stations of the Southern states and with commercial producers and seedsmen.
