CHICK CHATS

Good healthy chicks—that's the aim of every poultryman. But getting good healthy chicks is something else. Unless the poultryman starts with good stock and exercises good brooding practices, he is likely to fail. The care given to chicks should be the best, even when the raiser must devote much time and labor to the project.

There are many brooding pointers which advise the raiser what to do before the chicks arrive, when they arrive, and after they get started. Here are a few recommendations considered particularly important:

Feeding the Brooder House
The day before you expect your chicks, start a fire in the brooder stove or turn on the electric brooder. The house should be warm before chicks are brought into their new quarters.

Keep the humidity in the brooder house high for the first several days. A pan of water placed on the stove should help provide extra moisture. Remember that chicks will dry out if the temperature is high and the humidity low.

During the first day and evening keep a close watch over your chicks. Make sure they find feed and water. If chicks are too close to the stove, they probably are cold. If they push against the chick guard they are too hot. Adjust temperature to keep chicks warm and comfortable.

Other Suggestions
It is also a good idea to provide chicks with a small amount of light during the night. It helps the chicks bed down evenly. However, the light should not be too bright or the chicks will begin eating. A 6-watt bulb is satisfactory under most conditions.

Fresh air and sunlight are also important to growing chicks. There should be some circulation of air at all times, but avoid drafts. Sunlight is not only a source of vitamin D, but it also serves to some extent as a disinfectant.

Green feeds, such as lawn clippings, sprouted oats, and vegetable greens, may be fed to chicks after the first week.

The cost of living is now the highest in history and prices of consumer goods and services are expected to continue going up. For this reason, say specialists of the State College Extension Service, North Carolina farm families may make more money in 1952 than in 1951, but they'll probably have less to spend on themselves.

Revival services are being held at the Garner's Chapel Baptist church. Services began Wednesday night at 7:30 o'clock and will continue each night through March 28. The Rev. G. Roy Beals of Newton is the visiting minister.

Reverend Mr. Beals is pastor of the First Baptist church of Newton and a graduate of the Southern Baptist Seminary of Louisville, Ky. Prior to coming to the Newton pastorate he served as pastor of the First Baptist church of Carrollton, Ky. He is a native of Ironton, Ohio.

A service was held at the Garner's Chapel church on Monday and Tuesday nights in preparation for the revivals in the churches of the Eastern association. The Jones Chapel church joined the Garner's Chapel church in the service Tuesday night. The revival at Garner's Chapel church is being held simultaneously with the revivals in the Eastern association. The public has a cordial invitation to attend these services.
