SHARE YOUR HAPPINESS

Wouldn't it be wonderful if every time we felt joyous and exuberant, we found someone to share our elation? Psychiatrists tell us it helps to unburden our troubles and woes upon a sympathetic listener, and almost everyone agrees that it does. But why can't this rule work two ways? Why not share our happiness too?

How often we call a friend and say 'Oh, but I have the blues this morning. I just have to talk to someone.' Talk you do, and when you hang up you feel so much better. But what about the friend, is she feeling better too, or have you caused her to be depressed?

When you've had a particular piece of good luck, why not call a friend and say, 'Meet me around the corner. I want to celebrate.' Your friend will be happy too.

If your husband or friend presents you with a lovely corsage for a special occasion, don't wear it once and let it dry in your refrigerator. Isn't there someone you know who could enjoy it? What about the little woman who has been a widow so long, wouldn't she get a thrill wearing it to church? Anyway, you could ask her if she'd like to have it.

When you're baking, it's just as easy to make two pans of rolls at once, isn't it? Carry the extra pan to your neighbor who works and has so little time for cooking. She'll be singing your praises for a long time to come.

When you discover a good book, pass it on to someone else. If your dog has puppies, give one to some little boy who can't afford one if he has to buy it, but who would love one devotedly.

Perhaps sharing our joys and happiness is the secret key to that better world for which we are always struggling. I think it's worth trying, don't you?
