Hunting And Fishing In North Carolina

Hatteras Whopper; It's dry — and here's proof; Fishing regulations set for '53; Big drum visit Dare banks; Mackerel or Stripers — the secret's the bait.

The Point of Hatteras produced another whopper this week end. Capt. Bernice Ballance of Hatteras, an old hand at making fish history, landed a 56 1/2 pound channel bass in the surf. The fish was 49 inches long with girth of 29 1/2 inches. Capt. Ballance caught him with mullet bait and 36-throat line — Aycock Brown reports boats in Croatan Sound are getting 50 to 100 rockfish a day now.

When the seriousness of the North Carolina drought was pointed up with the closing of all hunting seasons — except waterfowl — some folks went scurrying for the records book, to see just how much hope there is for an early opening of the seasons. The future is not bright. November, says the weatherman, is the driest month of the year in North Carolina. In central North Carolina, for example, a normal total rainfall for the month is 2.28 inches. October has a normal precipitation of 2.93 inches. In December, things pick up with a combined rain and-or snowfall of 3.58 inches. And during the month of October, there was only 1.38 inches—all falling in four days, before the 10th of the month. In November, practically no rain worth measuring. With forestry officials predicting that it'll take a real soaker to eliminate the fire danger in Tar Heel woods, about all hunters can do is pray for rain and lots of it.

In the hubbub surrounding the shutting off of hunting, almost forgotten was the fact that the Wildlife Resources Commission set fishing regulations for 1953. No significant changes were made, except that white perch were taken off the 'limited' list. Heretofore, 20 white perch per day has been the limit. From now on, it's Katy bar the door! Reason, say the fish biologists, is that the succulent panfish are getting too darn prolific for the space in which they live. Trout season is the same as always. The big day is April 15th—and the season runs until August 31st.

It has always been difficult to set the ocean on fire, so salt water anglers didn't have the worry that plagued hunters. Most of those who took to the briny deep got what they went after — when the weather permitted. Because of choppy seas, however, surfcasters along the Dare banks had the better of it. Huge schools of channel bass moved in to the surf two weeks before they normally come in to be caught. That date has habitually been November 17th. The fish came in the first day of November — then moved out for two days — then returned. And last week, a party of three anglers, guide dby Captain Raymond Bassett, got 17 drum just off the Cape Hatteras light tower. They averaged 38 pounds apiece, and two of them weighed over 50 pounds.

Old timers around Manteo are scratching their heads to try to remember a time when more striped bass were on the loose in Croatan, Roanoke, and Albemarle sounds around Roanoke Island. Record numbers of the big stripers—running from six to 10 pounds apiece — are being taken by trolling — with bucktail lures being the most successful baits. Manteo guides point out that, while things are fine now, they should be better in December. Stripers like cold weather.

Those Gulf Stream fishermen who've wondered why the boat alongside got large numbers of king mackerel and their own boat got none have only to look at their bait. Particularly in the Southport area, skippers are finding that the big autumn kings have an unusual liking for mullet, trolled about ten feet below the surface. Artificial lures continue to take amberjack, but the mackerel don't fool easily. They want real meat.

LOBBYISTS ELECTED

This will never be a truly representative government until lobbyists, as well as officials, are elected by the people.

Income tax prosecutions of underworld chiefs might raise economic sanctions.

The United Nations seems to have about as much influence as the average husband.

As a rule you can judge the righteousness of a cause by the relative difficulty in financing it.
