Nostalgia or Disgust?

THE EPIC OF THE BED PAN

When I had my operation,
I displayed a lot of guts;
I could take it, smile and like it,
But the bed pan drove me nuts.

When nature called, I'd call the nurse;
And when I called she ran
And soon I'd have my carcass
Parked upon that goldam pan.

I'd slide back on my shoulders
But the leverage wasn't there,
And instead of something doing,
I'd shoot a flock of air.

And when at last I'd get results,
I'd feel around my seat,
To see if I had missed the pan
And piled it on the sheet.

There was cold sweat on my forehead,
When I'd feel with cautious care,
And with sighs of satisfaction
Find not a thing was there.

But now a new contortion
Would leave me weak and pale;
I'd have to work and twist and squirm
To wipe my poor sore tail.

I'd raise my sitter, high mid-air
This closed the gapping span;
My shaky hand would slip, and then
I'd grab that goldam pan.

The muscles of my neck would bulge
As I stood upon my head,
I'd make a few wild passes
And fall weakly back in bed.

And when I'd ring the nurse came in
And carried off the pan;
I'd wonder why, on such a job,
They didn't send a man.

Then finally, I'd settle down,
That movement was a treat;
But, wait a minute! What's so warm,
And wet upon the sheet.

With a gasp of apprehension,
I'd slowly raise my gown
And there beneath my sitter
Would be a blotch of brown.

And so, as operations go,
I'm a burly, big he man;
But gosh! It simply burns me up
When I miss that goldam pan!
