GRIZZLY BEAR
© 1953 National Wildlife Federation

Outside the areas in which they are deliberately protected it is doubtful if anyone these days can get much experience from a free, wild Grizzly Bear inside the limits of the United States. True, they may be seen in our National Parks and in our zoos but this is a far cry from the days when Grizzlies were more or less the dominating animal in much of the western half of the United States and the western third of Canada. On the whole, this is probably an improvement but it seems unfortunate that somehow a more mutually satisfactory arrangement could not have been worked out. Human nature and bear nature being what they were, it was hard to reach a natural reconciliation and as is usual the bear paid the price.

Many of us have had plenty of opportunities to see free Grizzlies in our National Parks, particularly at the points where they are fed for the entertainment of visiting tourists. Those of us fortunate to have visited these parks before the present enormous numbers went to them had more intimate and sometimes more startling experiences with them. To probably many persons, however, a Grizzly Bear is an enormous animal interested primarily in chasing and killing hunters or livestock. To those who have read Seton's story of Wab, the animal is one to be admired and pitied. Probably none of these accounts give us the true story of the animal.

An adult male Grizzly Bear may be over 6 feet long and stand 4 feet high at the shoulder, which is higher than one finds in the related Black Bear. Grizzly males may attain a weight of 1,150 pounds. The females are smaller in size and weight than their mates. Both sexes are colored a yellowish brown with a gray or "grizzly" wash. The Alaskan Brown Bear is larger than the typical Grizzly, reaching a weight of over 1000 pounds and is probably the largest carnivorous mammal on earth. There is much difference of opinion as to the proper classification of the Grizzly Bear group. Some give the Alaskan Brown Bear as a subspecies, while others recognize it as a distinct species. Some 86 forms have been recognized as being distinct by the zoologists.

Grizzly Bears mate for the season. The 2 to 4 young are born 236 days after the breeding takes place and each weighs about 1 1/2 pounds and has a length of about 8 inches. At 3 months of age, the young Grizzly weighs about 12 pounds. At 3 years, it reaches breeding age and usually by 25 years it has completed its normal life span.

The food of Grizzlies includes not only larger animals like deer, cattle and horses, but sheep, snakes, birds and even ants. They may also eat fruits and other plant foods when necessary.

Generally Grizzlies mind their own business but when crossed by another animal they can put up a prodigious fight. The track of a Grizzly shows the hind foot reaching a length of 11 inches as against a corresponding length of 6 inches in a Black Bear.

It is hoped that these magnificent creatures may never become extinct. The National Wildlife Federation is interested in reasonable protection of animals in danger of becoming extinct.

Good Range Is Essential To Vigorous Layers

Good range can cut poultry feed costs as much as 15 per cent, according to R. S. Dearstyne.

Dearstyne, head of the State College poultry science department, says that range will also insure development of vigorous pullets with a large frame, capable of continuous lay at an intensive rate.

During this month a large percentage of the layers will be hatched on it, for at least a year. The land should be rolling and the soil porous to assure good drainage.

Dearstyne says the first requirement of a range is cleanliness. The land should neither have been occupied, nor poultry manure spread on it, for at least a year. The land should be rolling and the soil porous to assure good drainage.

Dearstyne says the range should be free of deep depressions where stagnant water can accumulate. Legumes are often the best graz.

Words of the Wise
The finest business in the world is that which streams out to the ear of the spirit in many an exquisite strain from the little "shell" of books on the opposite wall. Every volume there is an instrument which some melodist of the mind created and set vibrating with music. —(James Lane Allen)
