ROSY FINCH

North America boasts four species of Rosy Finches with three subspecies of one. One of these subspecies is found in northeastern United States rather rarely but for the most part the Rosy Finches are definitely western and northwestern, one being limited to the Alaska area.

The Brown-capped Rosy Finch is found in the mountains of southwestern United States and the Black Rosy Finch in the mountains from the border south to New Mexico. The Gray-crowned and its related Heppburn's and Sierra Nevada Rosy Finches range from Alaska and Manitoba south irregularly to California and Nebraska and, as suggested above, occasionally east to Maine. It is the Gray-crowned subspecies that gives us this eastern extension of the species.

Sometimes the generic name Leucosticte is used as a common name for this bird. The Rosy Finch is most likely to be found above timberline in mountainous snow fields. It is about 6 inches long. The general color is dark brown but there is a pink cast to wings and rump. The field characters are the dark brown breast, high chirping notes and the light gray patch on the back of the neck that shows conspicuously in our illustration.

The hen birds are less conspicuously marked than are the males and the neck patch may be rather inconspicuous except on close examination. In winter, the male may show light brown edgings on some of the feathers of the back and wings. The female also shows some seasonal variation.

Adult Gray-crowned Rosy Finches have been taken in New Mexico at an elevation of 9,000 feet. There and in similar high mountain areas the Rosy Finches hop about in most severe weather, getting meals of small seeds when other forms of animal life are absent or hiding under cover. In summer they share
