This WEEK With SAM BYRD

MR. WHITWELL'S BROILY

Sunday afternoon my gimpy leg had deteriorated to a fancy Latin name. The pills were pink and expensive, and their desired effect was too scientific for me to do anything except hope for the best.

When you can't get about, and when you are tired of reading who-dunnit, sometimes your mind will whip you into a decent attitude and remind you that all the days were not spent with pills and pain.

Take a year ago. By supertime a year ago Sunday I had slipped out of Liverpool on the motor ship Murchison for Dublin. The Irish Sea was yellow with fog. The overnight trip was too short to whip up new acquaintances, arrival at Dublin scheduled for 7:30 in the morning.

I took on a pint of ale to whet the appetite and went down below to the dining hall, where I was lucky to get a small table in corner affording a view of the door and the passengers coming in to eat.

There were priests everywhere; traveling salesmen; a couple of American tourists, and in a short while the room was filled.

When the tables were filled, a smallish Englishman bowed at the side of my table and requested permission to eat with me. I noticed he carried an umbrella.

Mr. Athol Whitwell was about 55. He said "look here" at least a score of times during the pleasant meal. In short time I found he was a civil servant who worked at the Ministry of Town and Country Planning in Dorchester. He was spending a fortnight with his sister who lived at Dalkey outside Dublin. They had not met in 17 years.

Mr. Whitwell ate with some difficulty. His umbrella kept getting in the way of his soup spoon when the small ship pitched a bit in the sea. He saw I was not only curious, but puzzled.

"The Broily?" he said, "Now, broily is English slang for umbrella. He hugged the umbrella with the same reassurance that a spy pats his brief case."

"It was carried by Mr. Whitwell's grandfather, who handed it on to his son who handed it on to Mr. Whitwell. It was a sturdy creation of another age, made of stout blackthorn with a noble knobby head."
"It was carried by Grandfather Whitwell," he said, "rain or shine, until 1882, when he died at the age of 75."
"My father used it a few times, but mostly kept it in the hall stand, preferring the modern crook-handle variety."
"But since the death of my father I have never left the house in Dammers Road without it. In fine weather I use it for a walking stick. In rain, its excellent silk cover protects me from my home to the station, to the office, to lunch, back to the office, and on my return home. I have carried it daily for 25 years."
"On my train journeys it rests securely between my knees. In the office it stands under the hat rack. I always choose a table at a restaurant where I can watch over it."
Trying to change the subject I inquired how his sister would recognize him after all these 17 years.
"Look here, quite simple," he explained. "When I get to the Customs shed I raise the broily."
On the docks in the morning I

Personals

Mrs. J. O. Stokes, Mrs. F. W. McGowan and Mrs. Florence Currie shopped in Goldsboro on Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. Thurman Brown and daughters spent Sunday at Topshill in a queue waiting to have my passport checked.

Away down the shed I suddenly heard a familiar voice shouting "look here" and I saw it was Mr. Whitwell. He was making systematic signals with the broily at some one in the crowd outside the barrier. Before I was through with Customs, I saw him fold the broily, take the arm of a stoutish woman, her cheeks Irish red in the gray light, and together they caught the Dalkey bus.

Her legs were of the upright piano variety. I noticed, as they stepped into the bus. His were nimble British walkers. Sunday I remembered the walking, bouncing, broily-supported strength in their robust props and thought how good it would be to borrow Mr. Whitwell's broily, swing out toward the Cliffs, on to Goldsboro, and anywhere away from the clock, which was reminding me that it was time for another fancy pink leg pill.

saal Beach.
