CANVASSACK
© 1954 National Wildlife Federation

Sailing in from the sky, tossed on a whitecapped lake or served at a banquet table, it is hard to beat a canvassack. It may be equally hard to bring the bird from the sky to the banquet table but not difficult to get it from the banquet table into a hungry stomach.

Time was when our northern lakes in winter were white with great masses of canvassacks riding out a storm, milling around the edge of the forming ice or diving in apparent glee to the eelgrass beds deep under water for a meal of wild celery.

As ducks go, the canvassack is a large bird. It may be 2 feet long with a 3 foot wingspread. The drake may weigh 3 pounds with the duck usually at least 10 ounces lighter than that. The long, low-browed head is chestnut in the drake; the breast, black and the body white. In the female the body is grayer and the head and neck brown.

Canvassacks breed from central Alaska to Wisconsin and south to New Mexico or roughly within that area. They winter from southern British Columbia to New York and south to central New Mexico and Florida. During the winter they may form great rafts of birds where their abundance is sufficient and where food is obtainable.

Canvassacks favor the food-stored bases of wild celery, eelgrass or tapegrass. In spite of the differences in spelling, the specific name "valisneria" of the bird refers no doubt to the generic name "Valisneria" of the plant. It is not surprising that a plant of this type should have so many common names nor if one bites one of the food-packed bases is it difficult to understand why canvassacks seek it so diligently. They may feed with little difficulty in water from 2 to 10 feet deep and if necessary can go deeper. The abandoned upper portions of the plants may float to the surface and form great rafts on shore.

During courtship the male canvassack throws his head backward and pursues his intended. The nest is made of weeds and is usually surrounded by water and lined with down. In the nest are from 7 to 15 canvassack eggs and not infrequently a few eggs of redhead ducks or of ruddy ducks who by this technique relieve themselves of the labor of bringing up some of their offspring. Incubation takes 4 weeks and is the responsibility of the mother bird. There is but one brood a year.

Possibly the canvassack is our most valuable of wild duck. Good canvassack shooting grounds have a high value but in spite of these values it seems that the numbers of canvassacks are decreasing. In flight the birds often assume the V formation characteristic of the flight of geese. On the lake they resemble lively white corks. On the table they start the flow of saliva. The National Wildlife Federation hopes that these birds may prosper for many seasons.

- Billboard Mag's "Spotlite" hits HANK SNOW this week with "Let Me Go Lover" and ELLI WHITMAN, reviving an oldie "When I Grow Too Old To Dream." And that is the end of the page for this week. It's been swell chatting with you. Keep singing, and until next week in this same paper, and every night on the WCKY JAMBOREE & HILLBILLY HIT PARADE, where we like to gather 'round with all the friends and neighbors.
- So long,
Nelson and Marty
