Controversial Foreign Trade Bill Is One Of Toughest Problems For Congress

TRADE. The old question of what to do about foreign trade is one of the toughest and most controversial issues facing this session of Congress.

A general tightening of the domestic economy has thrown considerable support behind the high tariff school of thought. The so-called "protectionists" argue that high tariffs are needed to keep cheap, foreign produced products off the American market at a time when competition is keen among domestic producers.

STOCKS. The argument over trade policy is taking place under unique circumstances. Sentiment for high tariffs is increasing at a time when surpluses are piling up in all agricultural products — at a time when increased exports are sorely needed to reduce the backlog of commodities now stored in warehouses.

NEW APPROACH. In an effort to help break the logjam now choking world trade, Senator W. Kerr Scott has proposed what he calls a plan for a "World Food Bank."

Under his plan, free countries of the world would set up a food bank along the lines of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Under Senator Scott's plan, countries with abundances of food, fiber and other agricultural products would loan needy countries, through the world food bank, food and other raw material to fight hunger and famine.

Such a plan, Scott said, would permit countries with over supplies of food to get it to areas where hunger is running rampant.

"And it wouldn't be a give away program," he said. "That's what I like about the bank approach to the problem. It would be a business-like way of getting wider distribution of the world's food and fiber production. The same approach is working very well as to financial needs through the international bank. If it can work with dollars, it can work with food."

Scott said a world food bank would go a long way toward turning back the tide of communism. "Communism spreads like wildfire in areas where people are hungry. Asia is a perfect example. A world food bank would provide the machinery for helping feed millions of hungry people and give countries
