Free Wheeling

Three decades ago if a motorist ventured abroad at all after sundown he hung kerosene lanterns on his vehicle. The lamps were mounted to let other drivers know he was coming; they did little to show where cars were going.

Primitive lighting of this sort held sway until 1903 when the first revolution in auto lighting was introduced. This was the self-contained carbide gas lamp equipped with a tender mounted tank that furnished fuel. They were considered some improvement over kerosene lamps, but were still messy and dangerous.

Acetylene lamps were developed the following year. They combined with the carbide burners to form the acetylene lighting field from 1905 to 1914. The beams produced were extremely brilliant and gave early drivers their first real taste of after dark mobility.

But a new problem arose - how to avoid blinding oncoming drivers, an issue still around today, although not because of technical shortcomings. Efficient headlight dimming had to wait development of electric headlamps, an industry that started in 1908.

Vincent Apple headed the first company to make the new lights. His firm distributed the electric lamps as accessories during the first year, but the next year a rival, Fearless, made them standard equipment.

Some of the early models which lit up the road with electric headlamps included the Ecar, Mercet, Sterling, White and Falcon.

Current in the car also made stop signs practical for the first time. An historical note, showing that early day advertisers were pretty sharp, reveals that one accessory manufacturer offered a free collision policy with each stop light unit he sold. He was convinced of their value and besides it was certainly dramatic huckstering.

A dimmer switch to control headlight glare came along shortly but it wasn't too successful. It operated through a rheostat (variable light intensity) and soon gave way in 1915 to tilt-beam headlights and improved lens.

Early bulbs had to be focused each time they were replaced and separate bulbs were used for upper and lower beams. Fixed-focus units, with twin filament, arrived in 1924 and furnished a much more dependable light source.

Dimmer switches went to the floor and dual filaments appeared in 1929 to save drivers added safety at night.

The greatest advance of all in auto lighting came in 1940 when research engineers introduced the beam. With their reflectors and laminated hermetically sealed inside a soft glass lens assembly, the lamps were for all practical purposes and big light bulb.

They offered (and still do) a powerful beam of unvarying focus and their coverage of the road was carefully tailored to driving needs. And they didn't grow dim with time. On older lamps dirt and moisture often combined to tarnish the gleaming finish on reflectors with a resultant drop in lighting efficiency. Often this happened so gradually that drivers were unaware of the loss until it was at the danger point.

Added improvements of the original sealed beam have been greeted enthusiastically by the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators. Since the basic lamp was brought out in 1940, research has given them greater intensity, better illumination of curbs and road shoulders and a ability to penetrate fog and rain to better advantage.

The four lamp system introduced in 1953, doubles the effectiveness of road ahead illumination. Next on the new development horizon is possibly a sheet of light, produced by a solid bar. It would be mounted crosswise on the front of the auto and work
