Tuberculosis is largely an economic and social problem and from both view points complicates the work and responsibilities of public welfare officials. The disease finds many of its victims among the poor, ignorant, and defective members of society a part of the population with which the public welfare organization naturally comes in contact; it causes many cases of dependency, again the public welfare is vitally interested; the combating of this disease is largely a community problem and in progressive action along all lines of social progress public welfare officials are to be looked to as leaders. For these and other reasons the issue of Public Welfare Progress is leading its assistance to promote the sale of Tuberculosis Christmas Seals.

The population of the state is 2,559,123; 1,783,779 white and 775,344 colored. The number of deaths in 1920 from tuberculosis was 2,988, 1,449 white against 1,439 colored.

An economic loss of over $200,000 annually is suffered by North Carolina as a result of tuberculosis while the counties in the State do not average spending $500.00 each in combating the spread of the disease. When will society learn that prevention is so much cheaper than cure?
