Cotton Situation Before Adjustment manded will be granted,

Cotton farmers have learned that excessive supplies reduce the price of the staple and that elimination of the surplus tends to raise the price. "For that reason, the cotton adjustment program was designed to eliminate the cotton surplus so that a bale of cotton could have as large a purchasing power as it had in the base period of 1910-14," says Charles A. Sheffield, assistant extension director and in charge of the Cotton Adjustment program in North Caro-

"Studies made by the government economists show that five years prior to 1929, the annual gross income from cotton and cottonseed averaged slightly over $1,500,000,000. In 1930, it was $750,000,000. În 1931, cotton farmers sold their 17-million bale crop for $528,000,000 including the seed. The crop of 1932 brought $431,000,000. This shows how the value of the crop was first cut in half and half further cut in half again. We know what this did to the cotton South in standards of living, ability to buy and power to pay debts."

It is known that a part of this decrease in the value of the cotton crop came with the falling prices of the period but it is also a fact that the prices were further depressed due to the mounting surplus. Mr. Sheffield points out that consumption fell below production in 1929-30 and 1,800, 000 bales were added to the surplus that year. In 1930-31, consumption fell still more and 2,600,000 additional bales were added to the surplus at the close of the year. The next year, the carry-over was further increased by 4,100,000 bales. brought the world carry-over of United States cotton on August 1, 1932 up to 13 million bales. The crop of 1932 amounted to 13 million bales which gave a supply of 26 million bales for the season.

With this large supply serving to depress the price, farmers could not hope to have their normal purchasing power. Mr. Sheffield says at the low point of 1932, it took three bales of cotton to buy what one bale had bought in the base period of 1910-14. Thhe adjustment program was set up, therefore, to remedy such a situa-
