Soil Inoculation Is Needed With Legumes

Inoculating the soil with the proper bacteria is one of the secrets of successful legume production, according to E. C. Blair, extension agronomist at State College.

The bacteria enable the legume to grow and gather nitrogen out of the air, and when plowed under, the legume plants add huge quantities of nitrogen and organic matter to the soil, he continued. Different bacteria are needed by legume crops, and so it is important to see that the proper inoculation is given a field to be planted to these soil-building crops, which include clovers, lespedeza, vetch, Austrian winter peas, and the like. If a field is to be sown to lespedeza, Blair explained, it may be inoculated with soil from a field where lespedeza has been growing recently. Don't attempt to get good results from another field, scatter from 20

Take up only the top eight inches or so of bacteria soil, and be careful not to get soil containing disease germs or noxious weed seeds. Commercial cultures of bacteria may be obtained, Blair added, and it is much better to use these than undesirable soil.
