Old Tobacco County Does

Granville County, one of the old tobacco growing counties of North Carolina and a place where producing a fine quality of leaf is a cherished art, belies that a balanced system of farming is best in the long

There are 3,555 farms in the county according to agricultural statistics but there are only 2,400 farms according to AAA work sheets. On these farms, 15.000 acres of tobacco were grown this year along with about 3,500 acres of cotton. Yields of 1,000 to as much as 1,800 pounds of cured leaf per acre are reported in the county this season and a bale to the acre of cotton is an accepted

The yields of corn and other crops have been good also. But right now, says County Agent C. V. Morgan, Granville farmers are concerned about finishing "stripping" their tobacco in time for the market and in seeding more than 60,000 pounds of crimson clover and 10,000 pounds of Austrian winter pear seed. This much seed has been secured as grantof-aid material from the AAA and is in addition to a large amount bought locally. Granville farmers also have been busy planting rye, oats and wheat for winter grain and for grazing and turning under.

Six milk routes, in addition to one leading directly into Raleigh, operseem likely to continue favorable to ate over the county and in the peak There's no need for a chewing gum shortage. A scrap drive under the church pews, school desks, theatre seats and other public places will produce enough to last for the durato every farm; poultry is universal and good gardens have abounded this

"We have an excellent tobacco growing situation here," said Mr. Morgan, "but our farmers are using 50-cent tobacco for building a lasting and improved system of farming."
