At the end of the winding routs, he was greeted by the President of the United States from whose hands he received the highest award for vahe received the nigness for the Air Service may bestow, the Distinguished flying Cross.

Here the slender youth who wrote the greatest spic an airman had composed faced a sea of uncounted thoneands as he bent his six feet two inches of sixely body to bring his emitting face in front of the microphones which carried his voice to every cerner of the country and to distant

It was a simple, brief message he delivered, one of affection for the people for the New World from the people of the old, a people who hon-ored him as perhaps no other private citisen in all history has been honor ed in foreign lands. This speech of just 124 words brought a renewed ovation from the enthusiastic thousands of his immed tate audience, but if their applaus or that of the thousands upon thou ands who greated him along Pennaylvania avenue stirred his emotions they were kept under control by those same nerves of steel which carried him safely through a night of fog alest and rain out on the broad ocean expanse just three yeeks ago.

The young pilots composure in the face of such applause wall one of the things upon which the crowd after-wards remarked. While men, women and children shricked the joy that was theirs at a mere sight of him, Col Lindbergh appeared to give only occasional heed, waving his hand and smiling now and then.
