Anxious Moments In Church Service

In a Mount Olive church recently, while the offering was being taken, the plate was passing along a pew in which were seated two little boys of about five and seven years of age, and their father.

Those who know little boys, particularly brothers, of such relative ages are aware of the deep resentment the younger feels at being treated as if he isn't as big and capable as the older in anything. And they know the contempt for the little fellow which the older feels in doing things like the grown-ups.

As the collection plate came to the little boys, the older reached over the younger and took the plate before the latter could get his hands on it as if to say, "You're not old enough to do this, but I am." Whereupon, the smaller boy stuck out his bottom lip, folded his arms with his pennies squeezed in one hand and backed deep into the seat obviously muttering, "O.K., if I can't hold the plate I won't put my money in."

The child holding the plate then thrust it under his brother's nose and actually hissed between clenched teeth, "Put your money in!" The father was a little too far away to interfere without considerable commotion, so the drama proceeded while his face reddened. He could see the plate dropped to the floor and two little boys tangle in a brotherly scrap right then and there—or some such outcome. But something probably registered in the back of that little boy's mind about reverence in church, for he gave in—partly. He didn't just put his pennies into the plate, though. He almost wound up and threw them. Luckily, they all landed in it without bouncing out and the collection was resumed.

The Lord probably looked on that bit of irreverence with considerably more tolerance than did the father, considering the little individuals involved.

The moral, if any, in this lies in that last sentence above. If you have small children who occasionally make outbreaks of one kind or another in church, don't let them keep you away. The Lord, and the preachers, would rather you bring them than not, regardless of occasional disturbances. Most all preachers doubtless feel as a former minister of a Mount Olive church told his congregation one Sunday, "Little children don't disturb me—their presence inspires me."—E.B.

Drivers Should Consider How to Avoid Accidents

What can be done to avert an auto collision? This is a question that every driver should consider as warm weather approaches and traffic fills the open highways.

Fortunately, when two cars pass each other, the drivers usually hear only a pleasing whish, but now and then their nerves are shattered by a spine-chilling crash and scream of twisting metal. Usually, somebody gets hurt, and far too often meets an agonizing death.

There are a number of things you as a driver can do to avoid locking horns with your fellow motorist. Mostly, it is a matter of thinking out the situation in advance and rehearsing your strategy until you can act on a split second's notice.

This may be done by imagining various crash situations as you drive along and deciding what you would do to dodge them. The most common emergencies to prepare for are these:

- (1) A car coming toward you head on in your lane.
  - (2) An oncoming car swerving at you from the opposite lane.
  - (3) A car coming toward you from an intersecting street or road.
  - (4) A car passing you and cutting in too soon.
  - (5) A vehicle stopped or stopping suddenly ahead of you.
- If it is a choice between hitting an oncoming vehicle and "hitting the ditch," that is, running off the road, the latter is usually the right choice, except where there are pedestrians. Remember that the impact of hitting a stationary roadside object may be far less than the wallop of a car moving toward you. If you are certain to collide, however, it is still possible in many cases to swerve so that you take the impact with a glancing blow rather than head on, which means striking with much less force.
- If doubt arises as to which direction you should swerve, remember that in approximately 90 per cent of the cases your chances are better by swerving to the right.
- Few drivers are aware of the surprising distance that a car travels in a second's time. If you learn to recognize and understand this distance at varying speeds, and are prepared to act accordingly, you are in a much better position to avoid a collision.

A quick method for estimating this distance traveled per second is to multiply the speedometer reading by one and one-half. Thus, at 20 M.P.H. you travel approximately 30 feet per second; and at 40 M.P.H. you cover close to 60 feet. But watch out if you are doing sixty. You are covering almost 90 feet per second or each time your watch ticks five times. Ninety feet is five times the length of your automobile.

Suppose that you had only 200 feet in which to prevent a collision, could you stop or swerve in time? If you're going fifty, it will be almost impossible for you to stop in that distance.

To sum it all up, one of the best ways of avoiding a collision, is to travel at reasonable speeds at all times, and in keeping with highway conditions. But if your subconscious driving mind is properly educated and rehearsed, it will work wonders toward helping you to avoid that crash.

Incidentally, one of the principal reasons why horns were invented is to warn of an impending emergency. Always use it to alert the other driver while you are taking your own emergency action.
