Many Household Jobs Hide Various Dangers

You don't really link danger with the many jobs you do around the house each day, but actually many of them may hide a risk that is very real, though invisible.

According to State College home management specialist Mamie Whisnant, this is a good point to bear in mind. Take washing clothes, for example. You don't ordinarily associate tragedy with this very common practice. Of course, if you work with the older wringer type machine, there's always the danger of catching your clothing, your hair, or little Susie's fingers.

But there is another hazard associated with washing clothes that strikes with even more tragic results. According to U.S. Department of Agriculture specialists, there is the possibility of being shocked if your electric appliance used with water or in damp places are not properly grounded. Without this very necessary protection, a stray current seeking the easiest way into the ground, may run through your body.

Some manufacturers equip their machines with a cord that grounds the machine wherever it is plugged in. The special cords have a three-pronged plug that requires a three-hole outlet to fit it.

Some other washers have a three-wire cord and a two-prong plug that fits in the conventional socket. The third wire is used for grounding purposes.
