There is a best time and method for propagating each kind of tree, shrub or plant. We cannot discuss all of them here, but there are a few plants that are most successfully propagated at this season of the year.

For example, many gardeners in eastern North Carolina are growing the evergreen species of azaleas. Of course, it is easy to purchase azaleas from the nurseries but that takes money and growing your own is not very difficult if you are willing to give them some care. These azaleas may be easily propagated by cuttings taken from the plant in June or July. The cuttings should be made of the present season's wood, about four inches long, after the base of the new stem has become partially matured.

The best medium in which to root azaleas is a mixture of half pure sand and half peat moss. This material may be put in a special frame or shallow box to a depth of about six inches in a place where the frame can be shaded and watered when necessary. The leaves should be stripped from the lower half of the cutting.

The basal end with a short knife, and dipped in rootone powder. Then the cuttings are inserted in the sand and peat mixture about half their length and firmed. They may be set close together in rows. Strict attention must be paid to shading and watering. In a few weeks roots will develop on most of the cuttings and they should be potted or transplanted to a cold frame where they can be protected until ready to set out in a permanent place. Rootone powder may be obtained in any large seed store.

The peach is another plant that must be propagated at this time of the year. It will not come true to variety from seed and therefore if you have any peach seedlings it is best to graft a known variety onto them. Since the peach cannot be grafted successfully in winter like the apple it must be budded during July or August. Contact your county agent at once for instructions or bulletins on budding peach trees.

Pecans are also budded at this time of year. A pecan does not come true to variety from seed.
