The Florida Brief

One of the first Southern States to file a brief with the U.S. Supreme Court, on the question of integrating the public schools, was the State of Florida. The Florida brief pointed out to the high Court that for many years about seventy. Florida has maintained a dual system of schools.

It argued that "time, tact, and wisdom" were necessary if segregated schools were to be ended in Florida in an equitable manner "without destroying the school system."

Florida Attorney-General Richard Erwin, in his brief, told the Court that many states were now faced with "the toughest job in practical government . . . ever without going to war." Erwin said, "A way must be found to protect the constitutional rights of a minority without ignoring the will of the majority."

Erwin reported that a poll of both Negroes and whites in Florida had shown that threefourths of the white leaders in that state disagreed with the Supreme Court decision to integrate the schools. The polls also showed that a large majority of Negroes thought the Court's ruling was just. However, the same poll showed that a majority of both white and Negro leaders expected serious violence and doubts the ability of peace officers to maintain order if segregation is ended sud-

We believe the Florida brief represents the general conditions—with degrees varying, of course-of most Southern States. We think that the Court would do well to give it very serious considerations, and point out that the main reason that violence and serious trouble have not occurred in the Deep Souht as yet is because the Deep South has delayed taking any action until arguments on methods to bring about integregation are heard by the Supreme Court in December.

The Florida Brief seems to offer a practical solution to this problem.
