

Fine Rescue Truck Useful In Peacetime

"Calamity Jane" rides again—not galloping out of the West, but riding on rubber tires to disaster scenes throughout the United States.

Packing such "weapons" as portable generators, powerful pumps and portable cutting gear, the Federal Civil Defense Administration's "Calamity Jane" rescue truck also differs from its colorful namesake in rescuing casualties instead of creating them. Both, however, could take care of themselves.

In rural areas especially, beyond city water lines and with no electricity, the truck's built-in versatility has saved the lives of many victims in buildings razed by tornado or blast. Its equipment has also been found useful by fire departments in getting at persons trapped in burning buildings.

More than 350 of these remarkable self-contained vehicles have already been delivered to Civil Defense agencies in all parts of the country, and many more are being ordered.

'CALAMITY JANE,' the Federal Civil Defense Administration's rescue truck, packs a wallop from debris. The $9,000 truck contains 300 pieces more potent than its namesake's six-shooters of rescue equipment of 99 different types.

They are used by the FCDA Rescue School at Olney, Md., and in local CD agencies in training eight-man crews to use the truck's 300 items of 99 different kinds of rescue equipment.

Among the major disasters where "Calamity Janes" played an important part were the tornado-struck cities of Flint, Mich., and Worcester, Mass., and in Chestertown, Md., following a disastrous explosion.

Equipment and training of the truck and its Civil Defense-trained crew were brought into effective action after an explosion in South Philadelphia last year.

The fire chief in charge reported that debris buckets, shovels, portable cutting gear, hydraulic jacks and the truck's 15,000-pound capacity winch were immediately put in service as firemen and their CD auxiliaries cut and dug their way into rubble to free victims.

The 140-horsepower truck can race to a disaster scene at up to 60 miles per hour. Once on the scene, the body of the truck opens up on three sides for quick access to rescue equipment.
