POINTS ON KEEPING WELL

TOBACCO

FEW of us are sufficiently broad minded to be entirely free from prejudices. We all of us have our pet views and our pet peeves. Too many of us make up our minds, not on the evidence that is presented to us but on our own interpretation of that evidence. If it is favorable to our own prejudices, we eagerly accept it as further evidence that we are right. If it is unfavorable, we either disregard it or find some way of explaining it away.

Strange to say, the widest differences of opinion and the bitterest feelings are often caused by disagreements on purely personal matters. What question since slavery days has caused such variations of opinion and bitterness of feeling as prohibition? And perhaps only second to that is the question of tobacco.

The use of tobacco is, of course, a drug habit. It was first observed by Columbus in his first voyage in 1492, among the natives of Cuba, and was first brought to Europe in 1558; over 60 years later, by Francisco Fernandes, a physician sent to Mexico by Phillip II. The seeds were sent to the French queen, Catherine de Medici, by Jean Nicot, the French ambassador to Portugal, and the plant was named after him and has since been known as Nicotiana. Today, the active principle of the tobacco plant is called nicotine.

Why the use of this plant has, from its first introduction into Europe, been so bitterly fought, it is hard to say. Many evils, physical and mental, have been attributed to it, most of which, up to date, are without any positive proof. Its use in four hundred years has spread all over the earth. The argument seems to come down practically to this, that those who use it like it, and those who do not, don't like it.

Many efforts have been made and much argument carried on to show that it is either harmful or harmless, but the question seems to be as far from authoritative settlement as ever. About the only fact that has been proven is, that in some people, smoking large amounts of strong tobacco is, in some cases, followed by a degeneration of the optic nerve and a falling sight known as tobacco amblyopia.

General Grant is frequently cited as an example of the danger of smoking. Reduced to its simplest form the argument seems to be: General Grant was a heavy smoker, General Grant died of cancer of the tongue, therefore tobacco causes cancer of the tongue. Hardly an argument that any present-day authority on cancer would care to accept.

LIGHT FROM FISHES

WHILE methods of lighting have undergone enormous improvement in the last 75 years, we are still far from an ideal light. When we remember that our grandparents, in many cases, knew no other form of artificial light than a wax or tallow candle and that oil lamps, gas and electric lights have all come into being; at least into general use, in less than 100 years, certainly progress seems to have been rapid.

But scientific men are not satisfied and are still searching for a light without heat, that will be diffuse and general, instead of coming from a single source, such as a lamp, a gas jet or an electric film.

The idea of light without heat seems, at first thought, an impossibility, yet we know that it does exist in nature. It is found in glow worms, fireflies and a few deep sea fish.

I remember as a boy in southern Illinois, where fireflies abound in the summer, one of our favorite amusements in the evening was catching dozens of fireflies and putting them into a bottle. No matter how many we caught or how full the bottle might be or how brightly they shone, there was never any heat. Travelers in the tropics tell of a tropical firefly so large and making so bright a light that they can actually be used as lamps, and by holding one fly in his fingers the traveler can easily read a book or paper by its light.

In a recent issue of Discovery, a most fascinating English magazine devoted to accounts of new and strange things in all branches of human knowledge, appears an article on "Light from Fishes." A common little fish, it says, is often brought up in large quantities by the trawlers, in the fishing grounds of Galway. The fish, when closely examined, is seen to have some peculiar characteristics.
