TWO PER CENT FOR RESEARCH.

By coincidence, Boston celebrated its annual Research Day on the opening of National Cotton Week. This was fitting, for few industries have benefited more from modern research than has cotton. And helping cotton is a matter of importance not only to the New England states that spin it, but also to the eighteen states and 2,500,000 families engaged in growing it.

New dyes, new constructions, new designs, all contributed by research in laboratory and in field, have helped greatly in regaining for cottons an equal prominence in the fashion pages with those synthetic fibers which for a time threatened to dominate. And if proof is needed of the immense part research is playing in changing the materials of our daily use, it can be noted that synthetic fibers are themselves an earlier product of the laboratory.

In Oregon, experiments are progressing with a new low-cost housing material composed of wood covered with cotton cloth impregnated with resinous, permanent coloring. In the Southwest, a cotton plant has been evolved with many seeds and little lint, to aid in meeting defense needs for the fats from which are extracted some components of explosives.

All over the Nation alert merchandisers are emphasizing the re-use possibilities of cotton sacks for flour, sugar, salt, and other commodities; this, in an effort to combat the inroads paper packaging has made in this field. Research is aiding by supplying printed labels that will wash off easily, and a type of sacking that will serve its original heavy-duty purpose, as well as provide dainty aprons and children's sun suits.

As for the value of research in other lines, let it stand on the New England Council's estimate that no less than 100,000 persons are today working in New England at jobs which were in the laboratory ten years ago. This fact lends sharp point to the statement of the conservatively-spoken president of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Karl Compton, that if producers would set aside 2 per cent of their defense profits for research, they would effectively solve the problem of employing their expanded facilities and personnel after the emergency. —The Christian Science Monitor.
