He writes: "I would like to tell you about some of my experiences but it's very hard to describe those episodes. You can bet your life that I had the very devil scared out of me a few times. On numerous occasions I had close calls but always managed to get missed."

ruthless and out of their heads. Some of them would walk right in on top of you knowing all the time they would be killed. They think if they can carry a couple of Marines with them to the grave they have really done something. When one does this he has really done something because we are usually two jumps ahead.

The way these islands are layed off--the land is laid out in sections with tree lines dividing the property very similar to a well-developed Southern plantation. Along these tree lines you can always find small roads. The principal crop is sugar cane and it grows in abundance. We got here just before harvest time and we did the harvesting, only we did it with machine guns. Jungle warfare is tough but that cane was tough also.

"Before we secured the island we ran into the same old trouble of getting them out of caves. These stupid Japs just never know when they are licked. The way they walk into traps would amaze you. Every darn night we could depend upon a patrol of the stupid fools to walk down one of the little roads, right into a trap and we could mow them down like flies. The only thing you had to worry about were grenades. Some of them were so doped up on Sakai and other dopes that they would try anything. I actually saw one attack a tank with nothing but a sabre. Of course you can imagine what he looked like after that tank cut him in half.

"I don't want you to think that I am getting blood-thirsty, because I've had enough of this already. This life just isn't for me. The sooner I can get back to the States and under your wing the happier I'll be."
