Tobacco Diseases Confuse Growers

Granville wilt, black shank, sore shank, and southern root rot—principal diseases of tobacco in North Carolina—are often confused by growers. Therefore, the identification of these diseases absolutely necessary, if they are to be controlled.

Howard Garriss, Extension plant pathologist at State College, says that this year some growers used Oxford 26 tobacco, which is resistant to Granville wilt, and were disappointed with it. The reason was that the tobacco was suffering from black shank, and the grower should have grown one of the Oxford strains 1, 2, 3, or 4.

There are no varieties which are resistant to sore shank or southern root rot, and there are no specific methods of control.

Growers who have damaging tobacco diseases should consult the county agent and make a careful study of Farmers Bulletin No. 1932, which will help them identify the principal tobacco diseases as they occur in the field. It contains excellent photographs giving typical examples of the various diseases and also calls special attention to the value of crop rotations in disease control.
