Dusting Boosts Income of N. C. Peanut Growers

The use of fungicidal dusts to control leafspot in peanuts meant added profits of $2,600,000 to North Carolina growers, says Howard R. Garriss, plant pathologist for the State College Extension Service. In fact, Garriss believes the control of leafspot is the most profitable practice a peanut grower can follow.

"These added profits for last year represent the increase in nut yields only," Garriss explains. "Increases in yield and quality of peanut hay alone more than took care of the cost of materials and labor for the dusting program."

Growers have increased their profits by as much as $50 to $100 or more per acre by dusting, he continues. He cites the case of a Chowan County 4-H Club boy, Jasper Lee Gray, who obtained a yield of 2200 pounds of nuts and 37 bales of hay on one acre of dusted peanuts. Jasper got a yield of only 1050 pounds of nuts and 27 bales of hay on an adjoining acre of undusted peanuts grown by Gray's father.

Garriss urged producers to have their equipment and materials ready to make the first application of dust during the first 10 days of July. A more uniform application may be obtained by using a commercial row-crop duster, either horse-drawn or power-operated. In some cases airplane dusting is recommended, although it is more expensive.

The recommended fungicidal dusts for controlling leafspot are (1) a dust mixture containing 4 per cent copper from "fixed" copper, or (2) 325-mesh or finer dusting sulfur.

Three to four applications should be made, depending upon weather conditions. If the season is normal to dry, three applications are sufficient; if wet, four applications will give best results. Late planting should be dusted only three times.

To get the full benefit from dusting, growers should realize that treated plants are still producing nuts when undusted plants are mature. For this reason, digging or dusted peanuts should be delayed a week to 10 days.

Using fungicidal dusts to control leafspot is one of the most profitable practices a peanut grower can follow.
