Some Weevils Killed But Plenty Are Left

Winter's freezing weather apparently has reduced the number of boll weevils in North Carolina, but enough of the pests are still left to cause cotton growers plenty of trouble next summer.

That's the report of George D. Jones, extension entomologist at N. C. State College.

Jones says a recent check shows the number of weevils to be only one-third as large as the number found a year ago. He adds, however, that the survey just finished is only preliminary, and the full story on the weevil won't be known until May or June.

The specialist believes farmers can expect about the same number of weevils this year as there were in 1949, "if the recent count presents a true picture."

While 1949 was a "bad" weevil year, many lint growers found that poisoning paid. Average cotton yield that year was 250 pounds, but farmers who dusted their crops properly five to seven times produced from one to three-quarter bales to the acre.

Last year's overwintering weevil population was some three or four times the number estimated for the winter of 1949. Jones recalls that boll weevils and other cotton insects caused Tar Heel farmers to lose about one-half — or more than $40,000,000 worth — of the 1950 crop.

He urges cotton growers to be thoroughly prepared to fight insects again in 1951. "Farmers who spent $15 to $20 per acre last year for insecticides — and applied them properly — harvested from 400 to 900 pounds of cotton per acre," says Jones.

In 1950 the Forest Service of the U. S. Department of Agriculture reseeded 62,986 acres of range land.

More than 50 million baby chicks are started by North Carolina poultrymen each year.
