School Board Chairman Tells What He' Thinks

Robert Gatlin,, chairman of the county board of education, haid yesterday that he felt that the people of this county whose children will be busting out of the seams of some of the schools (particularly Raeford Graded) today were entitled to know why the buildings for which they voted $280,000 had not been built.

This has been explained briefly by Supt. MacDonald a time or two, and it boils down to the fact that the Schoolhouse planning division of the State department of public instruction is Flora Macdonald College during going to have to tell the Hoke

> The county board submitted plans to the division on the Upchurch addition, the Indian school and the Raeford Graded school adition. The first two were approved, and the third was disapproved as being "not suitable." The board being of the opinion that it can get more for the money by getting bids on all three projects at once, nothing Hubbard Returning has been done.

The plan submitted by the board called for a modern, onestory building with nine classrooms and a lunchroom to be built on the northeast corner of the block the Raeford Graded school occupies, enabling heat from the old building to be used, enabling one lunchroom to be used by all, and taking up the least amount of playground space. ning courses offered for the first Division said why not build it

> The board won't do this. Meantime the five exten classrooms expected to be needed when school opens today will be the music room, the stock room, the shack in the yard, and possibly two rooms over at the high school if they are an absolute necessity. Under the bureaucratic setup of government today, a county can't build a building until the State says o. k., so the board is going to have to come up with something that suits the division before anything is done.

Guardsmen Get Back During Day This Time

Battery and Battalion Are Rated High By Inspector

Battery A, 130th AAA Battalion North Carolina National Guard, Raeford and Hoke County's unit, rolled into Raeford from Fort McClellan, Alabama, at about 6:15 last Sunday afternoon, the first of their encampments they have managed to return from in the daytime in several years. Seventy-nine men, one warrant officer and five officers, all under the command of 1st Lt. Edwin D. Newton, made the trip, which most of them describe as their best camp yet from all standpoints.

The second week of the encampment was not quite so comfortable as the first, but it was quite interesting to most. On Monday the battery went out with the battalion and the field artil-Preston Monroe, colored, paid lery battalions of the 30th Division artillery and set up an air A. R. Munpower, white got 90 defense of the field artillery air strip in the maneuver area about 12 miles from Fort McClellan. These positions were occupied until Wednesday when the whole battalion moved under field artillery fire up to high ground near the artillery impact area. There the 40mm and .50 caliber artiaircraft guns were set up and fired at stationary targets in the same area into which the field artillery was firing. This was the first experience in firing at stationary targets, and, although they were much farther away than any previous target, the firing was interesting and quite successful from a training standpoint: This firing was concluded Thursday when the battalion made a tactical move with the other battalions back to Fort McClellan.

Friday morning the battalion participated in a review with the entire 30th Division, a sight which was quite impresive to mist of the local men. Friday was payday, and early Saturday the battery left in its trucks for Athens, Ga., where they spent the night, proceeding to Raeford on Sunday.

While in Fort McClellan the batttalion was visited by a senior officer of the Regular Army who spent several days with the unit as an inspector. He gave each of the five batteries, including Battery A, a general rating of Superior, the highest rating the could give. He was also otherwise quite complimentary in his rearks about the unit, which is commanded by Lt. Col. William Lamont, Jr.
