Mostly about GUN DOGS

Distemper in Dogs

Perhaps the most dreaded word known to the dog profession, whether it be the professional dog owner or just the one dog pet owner, is the virus known as "distemper." It is not a subject that should be taken lightly, nor is it one that should be greatly feared, and denied as ever having been connected with your dog or dogs.

Much is already known about distemper, and much is still to be learned about distemper. Certainly the old idea, of letting nature take its course without prevention or precaution, is pure folly. Today, we have temporary shots that are not 100%, but give excellent immunity for a period of up to 21 days. On a more permanent basis, once small pups are old enough, there are other methods of inoculation that are very effective in giving your dog life-long immunity to this dreaded virus.

The most important step is to take measures of precaution before the distemper virus has started its deadly work on your dog. A visit to your Veterinarian when you first get your young pup is highly recommended, as distemper strikes most frequently at dogs under one year of age. Even should your dog contract distemper, if caught soon enough, with proper medical care, drugs and personal attention, his chances of recovery are very good. Symptoms are much like worms in very young pups with a loss of appetite, runny eyes and nose, loose bowels, dry skin, dry cough and loss of weight, all of which are usually accompanied with a fever.

The one bright thing about distemper, once the dog has it and recovers, chances are excellent that it will never strike at him again.

This beagle, from the pack of Morgan Wing, has lots of personality and graceful stride that set her off from the rest of the pack, says Louis Fegom, of the Purina Dog Department Staff. She has a wonderfully true hand-type head, her neck and shoulders are excellently formed, fitting into a great pair of straight legs with perfect foot. (Purina News Bureau Photo.)
