Garden Time

By M. E. GARDNER Dept. of Horticultural Science N. C. State University

If your gardenia plants did not bloom well this summer you can blame it on the ex-tremely low temperatures last Some plants were badly damaged, others almost killed. If they made it through the summer, we can hope for better luck next year.

I have been closely observing four nice plants at a friend's home. One was so badly damaged that we cut it back severely. Three others, better protected, fared better but only produced four or five blossoms. The one we pruned severely has come out real

If you would like to try "gibbing" some camellia buds, now is a good time to buds, now is a good time to start. By treating a few flower buds every 10 days to two weeks, the opening of the flowers will be hastened. I would wait a while before treating the earliest varieties. You can get larger blossoms on camellias by dis-budding; much the same as for chrysanthemums and roses. The leaf (vegetative) buds are smaller than the flower buds and more pointed. The flower buds are larger and more

In some varieties, the flower buds are inclined to cluster. In this case, remove the smaller buds. Disbudding is only desirable for the production of large flowers. If you want a profusion of bloom, disbudding is not necessary.

Take especially good care of your roses if you want good flowers to exhibit at your local fair or garden show. Disbud for larger flowers and keep the sprayer busy in the constant fight against insects and diseases. Imperfect leaves will put you out of competition.

Clean out the vegetable and flower flower gardens as plants mature and become unproductive -- faded annuals and old tomato, bean and corn plants.
They are unsightly and may be harboring disease and insect
