

Would Give Legislature More Power

Another power granted to North Carolina's already strong Assembly under a constitutional amendment to be voted on by the November 3.

It is one of seven changes in the North Carolina Constitution that will appear on the ballot along with names of candidates for state and national offices. The proposal will be third in order.

The amendment would be voted on during the 1969 session.

Proposed by Sen. Moore of Moore County, the amendment would convene a special session of the General Assembly by the Council of State, to convene a special session of the General Assembly.

The proposed amendment would give three-fifths of each house to sign a petition to call a special session.

The General Assembly would meet in regular session every year. Thirteen special sessions have been called since 1800, the most recent in 1966, which was called to reapportion congressional and state legislative districts.

There were strong support among legislators in the 1969 session for the proposed amendment. Its sponsors easily attained the three-fifths vote of each house to submit the constitutional change to the people.

There was no similar enthusiasm, however, for measures designed to increase the power of the executive branch. Turned down by the 1969 session were three proposed amendments that would have:

- Allowed voters to elect the governor and lieutenant governor to two successive four-year terms.
- Given the governor the veto, subject to being overridden by a three-fifths vote of each house. (North Carolina is the only state in which the governor has no veto).
- Reduced the number of elected state executives from ten to five, allowing the governor to appoint most of the others.

This tradition of the legislative branch retaining most of the governmental power is an old one in North Carolina. When Charles II granted to the lords proprietors their exclusive and extensive powers over the new colony, he stipulated that laws were only to be passed with the "advice, assent and approbation of the freemen, or the greater part of them, or of their delegates..."

And modern governors will attest to the powers of the General Assembly even though none of them ever suffered the problem of the royal Gov. Gabriel Johnston, who, in theory at least, represented all the might of the British crown.

Johnston, governor from 1734 to 1752, died with his salary 14 years in arrears.

The General Assembly, which held the purse strings, has refused to pay him.

If the voters approve the proposed amendment, it will take effect July 1, 1971.
