PREVENT FOREST FIRES!

Garden Time

BY M. E. GARDNER

The use of salt to melt ice and snow on highways, walks and drives seems to be more widely used now than ever before. This winter many cities and towns are making every effort to protect trees and shrubs from injury caused by the melting ice which carries the salt solution to the root system. Salt injury is causing wide-spread concern, according to Dr. Philip L. Rusden of the Bartlett Tree Laboratories.

In the New England states, damage has been especially severe on roadside sugar maples. In that area, mechanical barriers are being employed to carry the salt water away from the trees, thus preventing seepage to the roots of the plants.

In many areas of the country, intensified use of salt is causing injury to nearby trees and shrubs. Both common salt (sodium chloride) and calcium chloride are both toxic to plants, in heavy concentrations, and may kill them in a very short time. In lesser salt concentration solutions the roots die more slowly. The leaves may exhibit a scorched appearance, usually along the margins, and the terminals may die back causing a rather scorched appearance throughout the tree. When these symptoms are noted, it is usually too late to do anything to save the trees.
