WASHINGTON - In recent months, with each new discovery about Federal data banks and their collection, storage, and use of information about citizens, public concern has grown about the serious questions of individual privacy and constitutional rights.

The Constitutional Rights Subcommittee, of which I am Chairman, has received countless letters from interested persons all over the country urging that the Subcommittee schedule hearings to consider the impact of these data programs upon individual rights.

In early September, the Subcommittee scheduled a new series of hearings on this subject for early October, but it soon became apparent that the pressures for action by Congress on end-of-the-term legislation required postponement of these hearings. At the present time, it is anticipated that these data bank hearings will be held in late February.

The purpose of the hearings is fourfold: First, to learn what Government data banks have been developed; second, how far they are already computerized or automated; third, what constitutional rights, if any, are affected by them; and, fourth, what overall legislative controls, if any, are required.

Recordkeeping is as old as recorded history, and there is nothing new in the fact that governments and societies engage in surveillance, blacklisting, and subtle reprisal for unpopular political or social views. Men have always had to contend with the memories of other men. In this country, however, we are blessed with a Constitution which undertakes to secure to all citizens certain rights of privacy, and this applies to the arbitrary use of recordkeeping and information power of government against the individual.

In spite of these guarantees, the advance of technology has been quietly, but steadily, endowing officials with the power which accompanies computers and data banks and scientific techniques of managing information. The computer has now given the Government the power to take note of anything, whether it be right or wrong, relevant to any purpose or not, and to retain it forever. It is unfortunate, but true, that this revolution is coming about under outdated laws and executive orders governing the recordkeeping and the concepts of privacy which are relevant to another era.

Consider these facts: The Civil Service Commission maintains a "security file" of more than two million cards in electrically powered rotary cabinets. Its larger "security investigations index" contains more than 10 million cards relating to personnel investigations made by the Commission and other agencies. The Department of the Army and other military departments have stored vast amounts of personal data on individuals which is said to be relevant to possible civil disturbances and subversion. The Secret Service has created its computerized data bank to protect high Government officials from harm and to protect federal buildings from possible damage. The Bureau of Customs has installed its control data processing intelligence network which contains records about suspects entering the United States.

No one would deny that the Government of such a populous and complex society should not avail itself of the efficiency offered by computers and scientific data management techniques. Governmental agencies must, as Congress has charged them, acquire, store, and process economically the information it obtains from citizens for administrative purposes to deal with a mobile society and the misdeeds of individuals who resort to violence and who violate the law.

All of this is to simply say that we must update our laws to keep in balance the need for information and the use to which it is put. This is the area of concern as the Subcommittee seeks to examine data bank surveillance.

Local Business

Christmas shopping for 1970 should be a significant test of the value of newspaper advertising in many communities.

Although it appears to be a season of recession compounded by inflation, retail advertising for Christmas shoppers began earlier and seems to have increased in quantity over previous years. The trend is especially apparent in smaller newspapers.

The optimism of local merchants is not without justification. Personal savings has reached a record high while installment debts have been declining.

A new awareness as to the nature of his competition is one factor causing the local retailer to use the hometown newspaper for more and better advertising. The consumer with super-highways and airports at his disposal has an increasing number of options for Christmas spending.

When the local retailer fails to inform the consumer of goods and services available at home, he is inviting competition from highly publicized shopping centers fifty or even one hundred miles away. Promotions of metropolitan shopping complexes is expensive and wasteful relative to customer gain. However, it works because it is thorough and persistent.

Conversely, when the retailer advertises in his local newspaper, he is getting almost 100 per cent coverage of potential customers. He has every advantage over his distant competitor if he uses it.

If hometown shopping increases this Christmas, it will be because local merchants are doing a better job of telling the consumer of what he can buy, and for how much.

Students Honored

Two Raeford girls were among the 270 sophomore scholars honored at a special reception on campus (Dec. 9) at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro.

They are Miss Pamela E. Heath, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Paul H. Heath of Rt. 1, Box 221; and Miss Terry Ann Potter, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. T.A. Potter of Rt. 2, Box 271.

Purpose of the reception was to acknowledge outstanding scholarship by the students and to give them an opportunity to talk informally with various faculty members about areas of study in which they have an interest.

The 270 sophomore scholars were selected on the basis of scholarship achievement from a sophomore class at UNC-G totaling 1,342 students. Altogether, UNC-G has more than 6,700 students this year.

Dr. Bert Goldman, dean of academic advising, was coordinator for the reception. UNC-G Chancellor James S. Ferguson and Miss Merib Mossman, vice chancellor for academic affairs, extended greetings to the group.

Various deans, department heads, advisors for the junior year abroad program, the chairman of the International Studies Program and the chairman of the UNC-G Honors Council also attended the reception.
