Glimpse Of Presidents At Home Given In 'Living White House'

When Mrs. Eisenhower was first lady she conducted a White House tour in 1959 for descendants of former presidents - with surprising results.

As the group paused before a copy of the desk on which President Monroe had signed the famous Doctrine in 1823, Monroe's great-grandson, Laurence Gouverneur Hoes, pressed a spring to reveal a secret compartment even Mrs. Eisenhower hadn't know about.

The newest edition of The Living White House, published by the White House Historical Association, tells how the compartment in the original desk was brought to light by Hoes 53 years earlier.

As a child in 1906 Hoes "had damaged this treasured family possession, and its repair had disclosed the hidden space," relates author Lonelle Aikman. "Within it lay priceless letters written by Jefferson, Madison, John Marshall, and Lafayette."

Through this and other anecdotes Mrs. Aikman, a member of the National Geographic's senior editorial staff, points up the continual blending of past and present in the Executive Mansion.

The present First Lady contributed a foreword to the book in which she describes her feelings as the wife of a freshman Congressman in 1947, upon receiving an invitation to a White House reception.

"My husband felt that the work load of his new job was too pressing to permit us to go. But I persuaded him to change his mind by saying, 'We may never have another chance,'" Mrs. Nixon explains.

One of the book's 160 illustrations has historical value despite its inaccuracy. Taken from a 1906 newspaper, it depicts the wedding of President Theodore Roosevelt's daughter Alice to Congressman Nicholas Longworth.

The artist showed the wedding party impressively descending the grand stairway of the White House, the bride on her father's arm.

Mrs. Longworth, now 86, recalls in the book: "It wasn't like that at all. We came down in the elevator in the back and walked down the hall to the East Room."

An earlier White House bride, and the only First Lady to be married there, was Frances Folsom who wed President Cleveland in 1886. On leaving it in 1889, she told a member of the White House staff that she and her husband would be back.

"Four years later she kept her promise," Mrs. Aikman writes, "when Cleveland was re-elected - the only President to serve nonconsecutive terms."

The third edition of The Living White House, like its predecessors, was prepared by the National Geographic Society as a public service. Sales of the 148-page book help to buy paintings, antiques, and other furnishings for the Executive Mansion.

The Living White House may be purchased by visitors to the White House or from the offices of the White House Historical Association at 5026 Federal Office Building No. 7, 17th and H Streets N.W., Washington, D.C. 20506. Paper-bound copies cost $1.25 and cloth-bound copies $2.50, plus 25 cents postage.

David A. Hendrix of Raeford has received a scholarship from the National Association of Professional Gardeners for the winter term at Sandhills Community College.

He is one of six students in the associate degree landscape gardening program to be awarded a scholarship.

The students were selected because of their high scholastic standing in the fall quarter, Frederick W. Garrett, chairman of the two-year program, said. The grants will cover tuition, fees and textbooks.

The program includes classroom and laboratory studies in English, plant chemistry, botany, business mathematics and actual experience in the greenhouses of the Horticulture Building on the Sandhills campus.

Sandhills offers the only college course of its kind in the United States. Graduates are qualified for lucrative careers with national and state parks, golf courses, urban renewal projects, landscape and florist firms and allied business establishments.

Local Business

Commercial airlines are among the most troubled of American industries as 1970 draws to a close. Planes are flying with more empty seats than at any time during the decade.

A large number of ailments seem to afflict the industry. However, one that seems to be overlooked by airline officials is the nature of their advertising. A major part of advertising of airlines has gone into gimmicky appeals which really have no lasting effect in selling a commodity which is chosen on the basis of practical appeal to reason.

A repeated television slogan in which a soupy voice admonishes the viewer to "relax on the soft clouds of Conaire" isn't going to bring a great many customers to the ticket counters of Conaire. The impact of silly, exaggerated examples of personal service of a particular airline is not likely to be any more effective.

Airlines might well give more attention to the advertising media employed extensively by television networks - the local newspaper. It is one place where any consumer quickly obtains details at anytime with minimum effort.

We have enjoyed the friendship of many people, and still hope to keep in touch with a lot of them. However, we in the last eight months have come to know quite a few folks at McCain and I can say that wherever our work may take us, there are good people almost everywhere one may go."
