MOST VALUABLE - Henry Hostetler was presented a trophy at tennis camp at Atlantic Christian College at Wilson last week as the Most Valuable Boy Camper. He was honored for his conduct, participation and achievement. The award was presented by Coach Ed Cloyd at final exercises. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hostetler were present for the award.

I know Nelson Bryant and I like him because I've fished with him in the Gulf Stream off Hatteras, in the surf at Nags Head, in mountain trout streams, and I've hunted waterfowl with him when the ice was so thick at Ocracoke we couldn't get a skiff through it.

I like him because he is a good hand with boat, rod and gun, because he enjoys his work - which is writing outdoor columns for The New York Times - and because he revels in the unforgettable delights and glories of wood, field and stream.

Recently, Bryant published a collection of some 125 columns under the title, Fresh Air, Bright Water (American Heritage Press, 283 pages, $6.95). The book reflects his stated intentions in writing a column that appeals to far-flung and often sophisticated Times readers. He succeeds, with more than a little touch of the poet, in giving "an occasional glimpse of a mountaintop trout pond wreathed in mist, of black ducks flying low against a dark November sky over a brown salt marsh, of great, silvery tarpon rolling in the Caribbean, or red grouse rising above the purple bloom of Scotland's heather."

Of equal interest to Tar Heel readers are the seven columns from North Carolina included in the collection.

The first time I met Bryant I was to host him, with help from Chester Davis, Reid Bahnsen and Alvin Johnson of Winston-Salem, for trout fishing in the Daniel Boone Wildlife Management Area.

On first impression, the man comes across as a rather urbane, sophisticated world traveler who, with studied courtesy, can be as earthy, bawdy and plain-spoken as the situation demands. After several years of hunting and fishing with him, I now have him sized up as a kind of well-read country boy who may be as urbane and sophisticated as the situation demands.

When you know his background you begin to understand something of that. He has been a farm hand, cook, deck hand, paratrooper, logger, grave digger, carpenter, oyster fisherman and - for thirteen years - managing editor of a small daily newspaper in New Hampshire. When he took the job with the Times he was building docks with his brother near his home on Martha's Vineyard and freelancing for outdoor periodicals.

In one of the columns from the Daniel Boone trip, Bryant wrote: "Harper Creek and others, like it in North Carolina's Great Smoky and Blue Ridge mountains are not the best trout streams in the United States. Many are very good, and they course through wild and lovely country. Harper makes its tumultuous way down the mountain through a boulder-strewn bed, past steep rocky cliffs, past stands of hardwood and an occasional conifer, past the lacquered green of rhododendron." He remembered that as well as the 40 trout he and Bahnsen caught that day.

On a surf fishing trip to Nags Head, he was unable to sleep one night, dressed in the dark so as not to disturb his sleeping companion and walked the beach under a nearly full moon. He wrote: "I was grateful for the moon's illumination; it washed land and water with a holy light and enabled me to give a wide berth to occasional couples who lay close embraced in the warm night."

Bryant began one of his columns from a Hatteras fishing trip: "Music - it was something of Brahms - came fitfully down the wind to us as we rolled in three-foot seas offshore from Hatteras Inlet. The music, which came from Diamond Shoals light, a Texas tower manned by Coast Guard personnel off North Carolina's Outer Banks, blended with the excited cries of terns diving after bait fish and the sound of the sea surging against the giant steel legs of the tower, which are anchored in the ocean bottom more than fifty feet below."

All our trips have not been productive of fish and game, but as a competent professional, Bryant comes up with colorful columns in spite of weather and bad luck. At Ocracoke, when we were iced in late one waterfowl season, he discovered a native recipe for old drum (channel bass) that called for salt pork, of which he is excessively fond, reflecting his origin on the seacoast of New England. After quoting the recipe, attributed to Mrs. Dell Scarborough, he wrote: "So reinforced, you may be sure, a seafaring man could face the treacherous waters of Hatteras and Ocracoke inlets with energy and confidence."

I read Fresh Air, Bright Water with fascination and put it down reinforced, you may be sure, to face future days afield and afloat with energy and confidence in the company of Nelson Bryant.
