The Roth's will return to Switzerland soon, where Peter will resume his agricultural studies at the Swiss Agricultural Technical School and Susar resume teaching of German and French in the Swiss elementary schools

The IFYE program, part of the Cooperative Extension Service program of the 4-H clubs, is designed to broader the United State's understanding of people from all over the world and develop leaders with international vision.

Once considered only a "domestic program" the extension services have sought to broaden their outlook by initiating the exchange program which brings youths from other parts of the world into communities here.

The guide for programming the exchange programs calls IFYE a "family living experience." The belief of the program is "that international understanding must begin with the family group, the foundation for all societies your are, you ain't lost," wrote Southport's Robert Ruark a good many years ago in his delightful book, "The Old Man And The Boy.

Of course, Bob Ruark never took part in a modern-day either-sex (Buck or Doe) deer hunt, or he might have altered that memorable quote to read. "If you don't know where you you might be in trouble."

The fact is, modern hunters and anglers can't always afford Ruark's gentle logic because the days when man could hunt or fish anywhere he wanted to without undue regard for game laws is long past. Nor is that necessarily a bad thing because modern deer hunting regulations and management practices have given Carolina hunters more deer in the state than at any previous time in history, despite expanding civilization.

There are so many deer in some parts of the state that they are damaging farmer's crops. Furthermore, these deer popul, ions often become too extensive for the areas to support. The results are smaller deer, sparce food supplies and disease that sometimes sweeps

"If you don't care where populations are allowed to get

Last fall, a respiratory virus hit several areas -- mostly in the Piedmont ... where deer population had become too and thinned them considerably. It's nature's way keeping things under

By setting either-sex deer seasons in areas where deer populations are too high, the N.C. Wildlife Resources Commission can help prevent the problems that arise when deer overpopulate an area. And, at the same time, either-sex deer seasons give hunters a chance to kill deer that nature would surely thing through starvation or disease. This year, there are 19 counties in the state where either-sex deer seasons have been established by the Wildlife Commission following close study and public hearings - which brings us back to that earlier quote, "If you don't know where you are, you might be in trouble."

These 19 areas where antlerless deer--as well as bucks can be killed are scattered across the state with most of them in the east. Some of them and some are county-wide. But others have rather complex boundaries bases on secondary roads, rivers and even logging

Knowing this, the Wildlife Commission is making a concerted effort to get complete boundary descriptions of these either-sex deer areas into the hands of hunters prior to the permission. hunters prior to the opening of the seasons. In the past, these boundaries have been published in newspapers, not always with complete success. Here's how it's being done this year. A copy of the dates and complete boundary descriptions for each either-sex deer season has been sent to the some 2,500 hunting and fishing license agents and wildlife cooperator agents across the state and this information will be posted so that deer hunters can go by
