requires the Secretary of Defense to seek ways to reduce our nuclear stockpile in Europe. Fourth, the committee recommended a requirement that the Secretary of Defense find ways to standardize weapons systems for NATO allies. This could substantially reduce U.S. and NATO defense costs. In my judgment, it is not wise to reduce our troops in Europe more than the Committee recommendation for at least three reasons. The political situation in Europe can be described as unstable with changes in the governments of Britain, West Germany, France, and Italy in recent months. Second, there are negotiations underway with the Soviets to lower troop levels in Europe for both sides, and a unilateral reduction by us would end our effort to win concessions from the Soviets. Third, for the first time in five years, our balance of payments situation has improved, and we have recently concluded an agreement with the German Government to offset balance the payments costs attributed to our troops in Europe. This reduces the monetary pressures which have been a prime concern in other years. In essence, the committee bill seeks to keep our military forces where they are most needed.
