The Gypsy Moth is a serious threat to the trees of North Carolina, according to Ronald Baxley of the Animal and Plant Pest office. A small established infestation was discovered in Winston Salem in 1973 and was treated in 1974. Over 5,000 sex attraction traps to detect any male moths have been placed in North Carolina. About ten have been placed in Hoke County. Eggs and caterpillars are often found attached to cars, trucks, campers and all types of recreational vehicles that come from infested areas. These insects completely defoliate trees. The larva are identified by their red, white and blue dots on their backs. Citizens can be very helpful in being on the lookout for this insect and by notifying agents if some are found.

Cotton producers should be making plans to control the insect population that will attack the plants during this season. Scouting the fields is the best method to determine the population build-up. Spraying should not be done unless it is absolutely necessary, as this will kill any beneficial insects that are present. It will also reduce the insecticide costs for the year. When time comes to spray, the proper insecticide should be selected for that particular stage of cotton growth. It has also been noticed that there are few early weevils where the diapause program was used last fall. In other areas there is a large population of weevils already. Let's make a top yield on the acreage that we have this year by following all of the recommended practices.

Tobacco growers should be planning their sucker control program now. The top yields can be secured by using a contact type chemical and then by using MH-30 afterwards. The contact agent should be applied before topping when about 50% of the plants reach the button stage. Then top plants that are ready immediately after application, apply the Maleic Hydrazide about seven days after the last contact application. The secret to high yields is early topping of the plants and complete control of the suckers.
