Worker's Death Blamed On Safety Violations

State Labor Commissioner T. Avery Nye announced that the Occupational Safety and Health Division (OSHA) of the Labor Department has issued the State Department of Transportation three citations for safety standards violations that resulted in the death of a worker at the Method Maintenance Yard of the Division of Highways on Dec. 29.

Clarence Lee, 32, an inmate at the Triangle Correctional Center, was killed while welding on top of a liquid asphalt tank when sparks from his electric welder ignited flammable vapors from the tank and caused a fatal explosion.

According to Nye, DOT's violations are:

DOT supervisors failed to prohibit welding in an area where an explosive flammable atmosphere caused a serious safety hazard.

DOT supervisors did not inspect the working area, outline safety precautions, or issue a required written work permit before allowing Lee to weld on an asphalt storage tank. According to regulations, before welding can be done on a tank, all asphalt and dangerous vapors must be cleaned from the tank and the area.

Both welders and supervisors were not adequately trained in the safe use of their equipment and related processes.

DOT has issued a safety standard to prohibit welding of tanks of flammable liquids which was the primary cause of the fatality. This standard "will enable DOT to comply with part of the notice of violation," said Nye.

"It is ironic that a fatality should have occurred in the DOT, the state agency doing the most to comply with OSHA regulations. Our work with DOT has enabled us to obtain federal matching funds that mean we can help other public agencies with safety and health programs, at no extra cost to the state."

Nye also announced that a new position has been formed in OSHA's Education and Training Division to deal with the problems of getting safety information to supervisors and employees.
