past. Heritage would not have to be a matter for history books. Older family members would talk about the past, others would learn.

Further, there would be a sense of future with a connection between past and present. By normal interaction the three generations would create a sense of community.

In the meantime, until we can create three - generations communities, there are two kinds of activity that will help. First, we can help younger people and older people to get together. Children often have more fear of growing old than adults. Out of lack of exposure to older people they link old with "bad." Exposure to actual living people above the age of 65 usually brings a loving and happy response from children.

Second, older adults can be involved in school planning. These older adults would understand why education costs too much and would help keep education slanted in directions they understand. At the same time the schools would have a new pool of resourceful people who could help the schools with time and energy and talent.

Margaret Mead, who is now 75, has become one of the most outspoken advocates of having grandparents stay with families. Mead goes on to say that all older people should have an important place in families. Along with grandparents our families need widows, widowers and older people who never marry.
The idea is that we should reorganize the way many families live and have people of several generations together. Highrise homes and county homes for aging people would pass away. Three or more generations would live together everywhere.
What good would come from having older people, middle - aged people, young people and children living together? For one thing, the whole family would know about the

W. Coley
Some nasal decongestant sprays or drops may perpetuate the condition they are used to help, warns Drs. A and S. Feinberg of Northwestern U. Medical School. Use of vasoconstrictors immediately reduces nasal congestion, but this is followed by compensatory dilation with swelling greater than before the decongestant was used. The sufferer then resorts to drops or spray again. With each cycle the congestion increases - termed 'rebound congestion'.
