Housing Tips

by Willie Featherstone, Jr., Ass't Agricultural Extension Agent

The use of the sun and wood as home energy sources is growing in North Carolina.

Homeowners and builders wanting to learn more about these two ways of heating can attend a program on "Wood and Solar as Home Energy Sources" at McKimmon Center on September 26 at noon.

According to Willie Featherstone, Jr., Assistant Agricultural Extension Agent, the program is designed primarily for the "Do It Yourself" homeowner or builder, though it could be helpful for commercial home builders or designers.

Information will be provided on the performance and cost of presently available solar hot water and home heating techniques and devices as well as information on constructing and buying the devices.

Wood as an energy source will be discussed and facts on the performance of different types of wood stoves and fireplaces will be given.

The dollar and energy savings of various types of homes energy conservation actions will be provided and literature on all the subjects covered will be available for purchase.

Advance registration is suggested, according to Willie Featherstone, because the number of participants will be limited. The $5 registration fee does not include dinner.

For more information and a complete program, contact: Willie Featherstone or Mrs. Ellen Willis at telephone 875-3461, or come by the Hoke County Agricultural Extension Office located in the new county office building.

The program is sponsored by the Agricultural Extension Service and Industrial Extension Service of North Carolina State University with assistance from the Energy Division of the North Carolina Department of Commerce and the North Carolina Solar Energy Association.
