Report to the People

Meeting The Energy Challenge

The conflict raging between Iraq and Iran has once again focused our attention on the oil producing nations of the Middle East.

Although we do not purchase oil directly from either of these nations at this time, we are reminded of the vulnerability of the shipping lanes and the effect that such a conflict might have on the price and availability of foreign oil.

We all realize now what effect our dependence on imported oil has on the economy and on the inflation rate at home.

But I believe we are working our way out of this dependence on OPEC oil. The foundation is now in place and we are on the threshold of a new era in domestic energy exploration and technological innovation.

I remember when I sat on the committee that mandated the first mileage standards for automobiles. Today, we are seeing the results of these policies.

The 1981 model automobiles coming from Detroit are competitive in every respect with imports and fit neatly into the new concept of fuel economy.

Last year we passed the Synthetic Fuels Act and the Windfall Profits Act. With the new sources of oil from shale and coal, we are now at a take-off period in achieving our energy independence.

Additional sources of energy are being produced through new technology right here in North Carolina. Last month four farmers in Granville County built a plant that is now producing 350,000 gallons of Ethanol per year, and by 1981, the rate is expected to reach 1.2 million gallons. That plant produces fuel from corn, which is a renewable resource.

We have taken steps on the local level, the state level and the national level to fight for energy independence and we are today witnessing the culmination of many policies which will help us reach this goal.

BUILDING A STRONG DEFENSE

One of the primary concerns facing our nation is the state of our defense capabilities and the fact that the Russians have been spending a far larger part of their national income for weapons and missiles than we have in this country.

As a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, I have worked consistently to increase efforts to strengthen our defenses and to develop new weapons systems which will serve to cure this strategic imbalance.

For this reason I supported the development of the B-1 Bomber until the program was cancelled by the President. After this happened, we started looking for an alternative bomber.

The problem, however, was timing. The availability of any multiple manned bomber could not be expected before the end of this decade. This could leave the United States vulnerable during the mid-1980s, so a short term solution was required.

To this end I strongly advocated the development of the cruise missile. Production is now underway and the missiles will soon be deployed in large numbers.

The Committee was also advised by General Richard Ellis, Commanding General of the Strategic Air Command, that we could enlarge the FB-111, put new engines in it and it would do what the B-1 would have done. The FB-111 would be available quicker and would be less expensive to build.

Then a few weeks ago the Department of Defense announced that it has been working on new technology which will enable it to build a "stealth" bomber which would be less visible to radar and could penetrate the Soviet air defense systems existing today.

Questioning what effect this would have on our near-term vulnerability, I contacted General Ellis and was informed by him that the combination of cruise missiles and conversion of existing planes is still the best solution for the immediate future.

In his response Ellis says, "The need for a near-term manned penetrating bomber capability continues to be urgent. Two alternatives are available: the stretched FB-111 and the B-1."

He goes on to say that "after considerable analysis of both programs, SAC selected the FB-111 as the better alternative because of earlier availability, significantly reduced cost and minimal interference with the advanced technology bomber program."

Looking ahead to the next decade, we will need to develop an advanced technology bomber such as the stealth aircraft which could give us a significant increase in capability. But, as General Ellis confirmed, we need to go ahead now with the development of the FB-111 to help alleviate this short-term deficiency.

Personnel

Airman Lonnie R. Adams, son of Mr. and Mrs. Lonnie Adams Jr., of Lumber Bridge, has completed Air Force basic training at Lackland Air Force Base, Texas.

The airman, who is remaining at Lackland for specialized training in the security police field, studied the Air Force mission, organization and customs and received special instruction in human relations.

Completion of this training earned the individual credits toward an associate degree in applied science through the Community College of the Air Force.

Quewhiffle

Community Watch

There will be a meeting at Shiloh Presbyterian Church Educational building on Sunday, October 26, at 2:30 p.m. to discuss organizing a Community Watch Program for all interested citizens in Quewhiffle township (Montrose, Five-Points, Ashley Heights, Buchan, McCain). "Crime is really on the increase in Quewhiffle community and we need to do something. Everyone is urged to attend," the announcement of the meeting says.
