LAW For Laypersons

North Carolina's General Statutes provide that if you reside in this state, you may seek relief from acts of domestic violence by filing a civil action in the District Court of the area in which you live. The court thereafter may grant you a protective order directed against the person who has caused or attempted to cause you injury, or who has threatened to injure you. The protective order may be issued against your past or present spouse or against a person of the opposite sex with whom you are living together or have lived together as if married. If the acts of violence reoccur, a law enforcement officer, who has been shown the protective order and has reasonable cause to believe that certain provisions of the order have been violated, must arrest and take into custody the offending person and then bring him or her before an appropriate District Court Judge to show cause why he or she should not be held in civil contempt.

The occurrence of domestic violence is often unpredictable and may come at any time. A protective order may therefore be needed very quickly in order to protect the victim from suffering violence again, but justice sometimes works very slowly. Realizing the need for quick action in matters of domestic relations, the North Carolina General Assembly provided for emergency relief if a victim of domestic violence believes there is a danger of serious and immediate injury to himself or herself. In such a proper case, the court must hold the hearing on the granting of the protective order within ten days of the filing of the motion for emergency relief.

Naturally, much can happen in the ten day period before the emergency hearing takes place. The Domestic Violence Act therefore provides that the court may upon a finding of a good cause enter any temporary orders it deems necessary to protect the victim or minor children until the actual hearing takes place. A finding of immediate and present danger of acts of domestic violence against the victim or minor children constitutes the good cause necessary for the entry of this temporary protective order.
