LIMIT THE NUMBER OF RULES

It's important to set up some rules and regulations for a young child. But try to not overdo it.

Too many rules can slow down your child's spontaneity and creativity. And having too many restrictions might cause your child to build up resentment. Under these circumstances your child may resist your instructions and wait for the day when he can get out from under all those can'ts and don'ts.

In this case, he won't see rules and regulations as a stepping stone to learning self discipline.

So a good rule of thumb is to set only those rules and regulations that are necessary. These might include limits that help protect your child's health and safety. And rules that help to protect the property and rights of others.

LEARN TO TALK WITH CHILDREN

Talking to children comes easy to some adults but is more difficult for others. So here are some suggestions that might make it easier for you to communicate with a preschooler.

First of all, try to get down to his level so you're looking eye-to-eye at him rather than down at him. Crouch or sit in a chair. That should put the child more at ease with you immediately.

Next, talk quietly. Some children are more afraid of strangers than others. But if the stranger is loud, he is sure to frighten the child even more.

Also use clear, simple language. But don't talk "baby-talk." You're not helping a child to learn how to handle the English language if you purposely mispronounce words.

Also avoid sarcasm and other language subtleties, such as double meanings for words. Children won't catch on. They take everything literally.

But preschoolers do delight in the absurd. If you want to have fun with a child mention something that's obviously absurd. For example, if a child has on a red shirt, tell him what a nice blue shirt that is. Or if you're talking about the sounds animals make, say something like, "Birds go meow, don't they?"

If you can put a child at ease and can make him laugh, you'll have a new friend. You'll remind the child that there are other adults in the world besides his parents and relatives and they're fun to know too.

There's a saying that every adult needs a child. That's the way adults learn. There's a lot to that saying. Both generations benefit from forming friendships with each other.
