"Things That Matter"

by Lucien Coleman

Our church burned down the other day. It was a huge blaze, bringing three fire companies to the scene. And I'll never forget the superhuman effort those firefighters made to save at least a part of our building and the houses surrounding it. The windy, sub-zero temperatures were merciless. The windchill factor was something like 50 degrees below zero. Water from the fire hoses turned to ice as soon as it touched trees and the ground around the building. As the walls cooled down, what was left of the building looked like a huge ice palace.

As firefighters played hoses on the burning building, the heavy wind caught the water and blew the freezing spray into their faces. Two firemen were hospitalized with frostbite. They stayed there nearly all day, until the last smoldering embers were out.

Two of the units were volunteer fire companies. The men from these companies, along with the professionals from the Louisville fire department, fought the blaze as though it was threatening their own homes. The volunteer firefighters did the hard, dirty, dangerous job without pay and with little glory.

I thought about how many volunteer fire departments there must be all over the country, in towns and small cities from coast to coast, manned by school teachers, clerks, service station operators, ministers -- men and women from every walk of life. We owe them an enormous debt of gratitude. We hear the sirens from time to time; but we little realize what they do until a fire comes close to home.

According to statistics from the International Association of Fire Fighters, 70 firefighters died and more than 45,000 were injured in the line of duty in 1979. Undoubtedly, statistics from volunteer fire companies would swell these figures even more. God only knows how much pain and suffering is hidden in these statistics.

Later, it was revealed that our church had been burned down by two young arsonists. I can't imagine what kind of mentality would burn down a place of worship, just for kicks, putting lives in jeopardy and destroying a thousand sacred memories. They gave us a glimpse of the seamier side of human nature.

But, then, those firefighters showed us the brighter side. What they did on that cold Sunday morning bordered on heroism. They, and their counterparts in fire departments all over the country, deserve a vote of gratitude from all of us.
