FACTS TO CONSIDER WHEN GROWING VEGETABLES

The first few days of warm, sunny weather will create in many home gardeners across the state an urge to plant.

While this urge to plant is perfectly normal with the arrival of warm weather, "jumping the gun" and planting too early may produce little or no crop yields. Each year some gardeners make the mistake of planting vegetable seeds before the soil has warmed sufficiently for the crop to be grown.

All vegetable seeds have a minimum soil temperature range for initiating germination.

A listing of the minimum soil temperature requirements for most home garden vegetables can be found in the "Garden Manual" which is offered free to you by the Agricultural Extension Service. Daily updated information on soil temperatures across the state is available in the daily agricultural weather advisories issued from the Agricultural Weather Office at N.C. State University.

These advisories, written by Katie Perry and Greg Johnson, are available over NOAA Weather Radio Network and over many commercial broadcasting stations throughout North Carolina.

Proper soil temperatures alone will not guarantee that the vegetable garden will be a success. Good soil preparation is another necessity for adequate plant growth. The excitement of getting the seeds and plants in the ground can cause gardeners to take short cuts in preparing the soil.

Poor stands often result from large soil clods and undercompacted organic matter on top of the soil.

Another mistake in soil preparation is plowing the soil when it is too wet. The choice is simple. Gardeners can either prepare the soil properly now, or they can prepare the soil over again later.

A supply of nutrients must be available to promote normal plant growth. Lime and fertilizer should be applied to the soil according to soil test recommendations. To prevent fertilizer injury, gardeners are encouraged to broadcast one-half of their fertilizer and plow it into the soil with other one-half applied in a band. The fertilizer is banded by making two rows 6 inches apart and 3 to 4 inches deep. The vegetable seed is then planted between the two rows of fertilizer.

Planting vegetable seeds too deeply is another common error in the early spring garden. Seed should be planted three to four times as deep as the greatest diameter of the seed. While this is a good rule to remember, gardeners must also be aware that soil moisture is closer to surface in early spring than in the summer. Therefore, seed planted in the spring does not have to be planted as deeply due to cooler soil temperatures and more available moisture.

Good quality vegetables result from superior seed and transplants. Gardeners that buy questionable seed and spindly transplants are setting themselves up for disappointment from the very beginning. The saying that "you get what you pay for" is definitely true when it comes to purchasing seed and transplants.

An adequate water supply is another essential ingredient for producing quality vegetables. Vegetables have a water content that ranges from 80 to 95 percent of their total composition. Quality vegetables result from the rapid and continuous growth that is achieved through a balanced supply of moisture and nutrition. Therefore, gardeners can expect to harvest more vegetables if the home vegetable garden is irrigated during dry periods.

The Agricultural Extension Service invites you to attend a Vegetable Gardening Workshop:
DATE: Thursday, March 18, 1982
TIME: 7:00 p.m.
PLACE: T.B. Lester Building (Agricultural Extension Office) S. Magnolia St., Raeford.
