Led By Their Noses, Sea Birds Find Food

by Joy Aschenbach
National Geographic News Service

WASHINGTON -- At dawn Bernice Wenzel would sail out six miles off the California coast, pour hot bacon grease, puffed cereal, and popcorn on the Pacific Ocean surface -- and wait.

It wasn't breakfast for the fish, but the basic ingredients of scientific research for the birds, Dr. Wenzel was waiting for sea birds to fly by, determining whether the tube-nosed type rely on that prominent part of their anatomy to find food.

"Definitely they smell it before they see it. I have no doubt that odor is one of their cues," she said. But to what extent the nose knows, scientists are not certain. Nor are they sure how far downwind the birds pick up the scent. Estimates range up to a few miles.

Birds in general are not known for their sense of smell, and it cannot be automatically assumed that those endowed with large amounts of olfactory brain tissue depend on it exclusively or heavily. But it is reasonable to suppose that they may. And Dr. Wenzel and her research team have spent about a thousand hours on the water trying to find out.

Who cares? Black-footed albatrosses, sooty shearwaters, Northern fulmars, ashly storm petrels, and their other tube-nosed friends. Their lives may depend on it, especially if offshore oil drilling accelerates, points out Dr. Wenzel, a professor of physiology in the School of Medicine at the University of California, Los Angeles.

Scientists don't know what impact future drilling may have on these sea bird populations. If, for example, the birds would starve without their noses and if drilling odors interfere with their ability to smell their natural food, this olfactory information could be crucial. Even if the fishy food odors could still be picked up, the drilling odors may repel the birds.

So far, puffed cereal and popcorn have given Dr. Wenzel her strongest clues to their nasal sense. When these relatively odorless morsels were sprinkled on the water along -- without the added aroma of bacon grease -- the tube-nosed birds didn't even stop to investigate.

But the non-tube-nosed sea birds such as gulls flocked around. For them, something visual was "a potent stimulus," Dr. Wenzel said. The tube-nosed birds on the other hand were attracted to the open slicks of bacon grease even when it was not mixed with puffed cereal and popcorn. But the gulls were not.

Recently in her research, which is supported in part by the National Geographic Society, Dr. Wenzel has switched odor sources -- from slicks of bacon grease to plastic bottles of tuna oil and cod liver oil.

She has rigged up a truck tire inner tube with a wooden floor and pole protruding from the center about three feet. A small bottle of the oil is mounted on top with a short wick sticking out. It releases the fishy odors that appeal to birds that normally diet on anchovies and squid.

The tube-nosed birds apparently use their noses for more than just sniffing out food. Other scientific studies have indicated that their noses may guide them in other aspects of their daily lives, for example, returning to their breeding and nesting places on islands. When the olfactory nerves of one kind of storm petrel were cut in a study, the birds were unable to find their way back to their island nesting burrows.

Aberdeen Coca-Cola Bottling Company
Salutes
The UNC Tar Heels
With Limited Edition, Commemorative Bottle

Aberdeen Coca-Cola Bottling Company and local food retailers are saluting college basketball's national champion, the University of North Carolina, with a limited edition, commemorative bottle which every Tar Heel fan will want to own.

North Carolina's 1982 NCAA championship is one to savor, and we can't think of a better way to honor Coach Dean Smith, the players, and the fans than by issuing this commemorative bottle.

The 10-ounce bottle features highlights of the championship season. A portion of the sale of the bottles will go to the University of North Carolina.

The bottles are on sale at participating retailers.

Aberdeen Coca-Cola reminds customers that these bottles are available only in North Carolina. Supplies are limited, and we expect them to sell out quickly. They will definitely become a collector's item.
