This Is The Law

WARRANTIES AND SERVICE CONTRACTS

Warranties offer some protection against a defective product. Service contracts serve a somewhat different purpose: they offer a kind of insurance against the possibility of expensive maintenance and repair costs.

Warranties may be either "full" or "limited". A full warranty means that the defective product will be repaired or replaced free of charge. A limited warranty, which is more common, may cover only a part of the problem, such as the cost of parts but not labor.

Warranties don't cost anything -- at least in theory. They come with the product.

Service contracts are optional, and they cost money. They provide that the product will be serviced and kept in repair for a certain period of time.

When making a major purchase, it's a good idea to be aware of warranties, as well as service contracts.
