PREPARE FOR SUMMER'S SCHEDULE CHANGES

If you're a parent who has mixed feelings about the coming summer vacation, then you have a lot of company. Many families get into real hassles as soon as school is out, in trying to adjust to schedule changes. Waiting until school is out may be the reason for the hassle. So this year try planning ahead for summer schedules. For example, if children are going to need chauffeuring this summer and neither parent nor a car is going to be around, then the family needs to sit down and do some figuring. Perhaps a car pooling arrangement can be worked out with other parents or an older teenager. Or let's say, a teen's summer job is going to interfere with the family's vacation. Then there needs to be a meeting of the minds, too. Perhaps the rest can vacation while the teen stays with a friend's family. Or instead of a long trip, some weekend excursions may be better so the teen could be included, too. The main thing is for planning to be done early enough to avoid last minute conflicts. So talk over summer plans now. It's lack of communication that causes a lot of unpleasantness.

BUYING GOODS AND SERVICES ON TIME

Any credit, loan or installment sales contract you sign is a legal agreement. So you'll want to read all contracts carefully. And if you're asked to sign a security agreement, the Truth in Lending Act requires that you be given a description of the property that is secured -- before you sign the contract. If you fail to make your payments, the creditor may "repossess" the secured property. Here's a caution. Some creditors may require you to list property you already own as a security in addition to the item you're buying. This is important. For if you default on your payments, you may be risking the repossession of all of the property. Let's talk about what happens if you do default.

The creditor has a right to the secured property. If you refuse to turn it over to him he must obtain a court order to repossess it. The law provides that repossessed property may be sold to satisfy your debt. Under the law you must be notified when and where the property will be sold, so you may bid on it or be ensured that it's being sold for a fair price. If the property is sold for less than the balance of your debt, you may still be liable for the difference. If the sales result in an excess amount, you are entitled to that excess. While you should never sell, hide or give away secured property, you don't have to give it up voluntarily. If you have a good reason not to pay, you may refuse to return the item and consult an attorney. This will force the creditor to go to court, where you'll have a chance to tell your side of the dispute, too.

LABEL LOOKING

Federal law requires that certain things appear on labels. And it's all intended to make food shopping easier and simpler for you. For example, ingredients must be listed in descending order or quantity by weight. This gives you a good idea of what you're getting for your money -- especially if water, sugar or salt is high on the ingredients list and meats and vegetables are low on the same list. Not every package has a full list of ingredients and there's a reason for this. The government has set standards of identity for some products such as pasteurized process cheese, vanilla ice cream, mayonnaise and peanut butter. This means the basic contents must be the same, regardless of brand name. Options, such as salt and flavoring are what make one standardized product taste a tad different from another.
