Tarheel Health Watch

The most common medical complication encountered during commercial airline flights is hyperventilation -- rapid and deep breathing -- that usually occurs because of anxiety, according to the American Medical Association's Commission on Emergency Medical Services.

In general, the policy of airlines faced with a medical emergency is assessment of the severity of the problem by a cabin attendant who reports to the captain. If the condition warrants medical attention, a request for a physician's services may be made or, in cases where physicians are not aboard, a paramedic or trained nurse may be requested.

First aid training of cabin attendants varies among commercial airlines from four to twelve hours and may include cardiopulmonary resuscitation with annual refresher courses of one to six hours.

The commission recommends that patients not fly during the congestive stages of an upper respiratory tract infection. If flying is necessary, patients should use nose drops or a nasal spray during the descent or an oral decongestant one hour before descent. Patients also should perform a technique known as the Valsalva maneuver in which a breath of air is drawn in, held for a moment while the nostrils are pinched and the mouth is closed, and then is forced upwards by straining to exhale. This maneuver increases the pressure in the passageway leading to the middle ear and relieves the pressure on the ear drum. Crying in small children may have the same effect.

To avoid the possibility of dehydration in infants due to the low humidity of air inside aircraft cabins, small amounts of water should be offered throughout the flight. During descent, the swallowing of fluids may be helpful in preventing an earache by forcing air into the middle ear.

People susceptible to motion sickness should take an antiontation sickness drug before flying, but some other measures also can help. Flying at night reduces the visual stimulation that can trigger motion sickness. Sitting in a reclining position also helps as does occupying a seat close to the center of gravity of the plane and away from the engines (to decrease the sensation of vibration).

As a rule of thumb, people with any medical problem or those who have undergone surgery recently should consult with their physicians before flying.
